Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1905 edition. Excerpt: . . . mountains, plateaus, valleys, etc. 4. Slanting block to represent public work, as railroads, trails, etc. 197. Drafting Instruments--It is not deemed desirable to describe in detail the various instruments commonly used in topographic drawing. These can be found fully described in catalogues of instrument-makers and in works on mechanical and topographical drawing, lettering, etc. A few instruments, however, which are less common and which are peculiarly serviceable to the topographic draftsman will be briefly characterized. The pantograph is a parallel linked-motion apparatus for enlargement or reduction of maps. It is of occasional assistance in the reduction or enlargement of compiled map material, and is constructed on the theory of parallelograms. (Fig. 149.) The pantograph is, however, a comparatively inaccurate instrument because of the great play between the various parts. If accuracy is attempted, none but the most expensive and heavily constructed instruments should be used. There is an inconvenient variety of combinations in the adjustment and use of this instrument. The essentials are that the fixed, the tracing, and the copying points shall lie in a straight line on at least three sides of the jointed parallelogram. Two very useful instruments to the topographer are proportional dividers and three-legged dividers, the first of which is very serviceable in the reduction or enlargement of small portions of maps, and the second in transferring work from one map to another. In this operation two of the legs are set on fixed points common to both...
