Excerpt: .in another; and, when the impossibility of all this being accomplished without loss of caloric from the water, are considered, it will be easy to account for the origin of warm springs. The quantity of some springs is so little affected in dry or in wet seasons, as to afford reasons for inferring that a considerable proportion of the rain which falls and percolates the earth, is consolidated in forming matter, the result of its combination with different substances decomposing the constituent parts of the water. Melted matter, basalt, or other known volcanic products, appear to have burst through the strata, forming immense dykes for a great extent. The vacuity occasioned by contraction after cooling in the interior, may have been the cause of great dislocations in the superior strata, as the melted matter abated in heat. Some openings, even of large size, as well...

Reviews

This composed book is excellent. it was actually writtern very perfectly and valuable. I found out this book from my i and dad advised this book to learn.
