Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: .of journalism, as a reflection upon the intelligence of our readers. A story, in order to be of general interest, must contain in the first paragraph its most important item of news, just as in a speech or oration the introduction presents the gist of the principal subject matter to be discussed. For example, our correspondents invariably begin their articles by saying that a regular meeting was held at such a time and such a place, and that a certain person, or certain persons spoke on this or that subject. The item of interest is placed in the middle of the article, and usually phrased in such a way as to lose its value as news. And the conclusions are often editorial comments. If our correspondents, when reporting a story, will jot down the special features of a meeting, then carefully select the most important feature...
